

WEBSITE PROPOSAL · LOUIE'S BAKERY

Is your website still on vacation? It thinks it's July.

We went through louies-bakery.com page by page, and then we built the site we would put in its place. It is live right now. Everything in this letter links to the proof.

PREPARED BY KEVIN HERSHOCK · GLAZED WEB

MARSHALL, MICHIGAN · AUGUST 2026

EVERY CLAIM BELOW LINKS TO THE EVIDENCE.

SECTION ONE

What we found.

THE SHORT VERSION

- 01 Your homepage has been telling customers you are closed on vacation since July. It still says it today.

02 Your team page introduces three people who do not exist, with Latin filler where their lives should be.

03 Your testimonials page has no testimonials on it. Seventy-four years of goodwill lives on Facebook instead.

04 The address customers actually type, louiesbakery.com, is a bakery in Pennsylvania.

05 Your menu still prints a cash discount you no longer give, on every line, and your online store is quoting shipping dates from February and April.

The site says you are closed. You are open.

The banner on your homepage reads, verbatim: "we are on vacation july4-july20. we RESUME NORMAL BUSINESS HOURS JULY 21 AT 5:30AM." We checked it again the day this letter was written, August 18. A month past the date, it is still the first thing a visitor reads, and every day it costs you the customer who believed it.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

Your team page staffs the bakery with people who are not real

/team introduces "Bobby Rangler," "Lindsey McKevin" and "Sarah Rangler," each described by the same sentence of Latin placeholder text. Your actual story, a third generation of one family on one corner since 1952, is the best thing you own, and this page replaces it with lorem ipsum.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

A testimonials page with no testimonials

/testimonials contains a heading and a link that says "772 MORE REVIEWS ON OUR FACEBOOK PAGE." The reviews themselves, the ones that say things like "I can't eat doughnuts from a grocery store anymore," live on websites other people own.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

The footer says 2019, and the only video is not Marshall

The copyright line reads "Louie's Bakery © 2019". The homepage's one piece of motion is an AI-generated clip of a giant nut roll floating down a big-city street, glass towers and yellow cabs, a place your bakery has never been.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

The menu is still charging the way you used to charge

Every line of the online menu carries two numbers, a card price and a cash price. You are on Square now and the cash discount is gone, so the price list a customer reads before driving over describes a system the bakery does not run any more. The same list has the pastries row reading "$2.10 cash discount $0.60", where the sixty cents belongs to the donut holes above it. A price list is the one page a bakery cannot afford to have wrong, and this is not carelessness: it is what happens when changing a price means emailing the people who own your website.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

Your own store is still quoting February

Your store page tells buyers that orders "will be made & shipped on tuesday feb, 10". The cart page tells them "We ship April 25" and asks for orders "before Saturday April 2 noon". Two pages, two dates, both months gone. Nobody forgot twice. On a rented template every date is a sentence a person has to remember to retype, so dates freeze where they were last typed, and the busiest week is always the week nobody gets to it.

SEE THE STORE PAGE ↗

SEE THE CART PAGE ↗

The name customers type belongs to somebody else

louiesbakery.com, without the hyphen, is a family bakery in Emmaus, Pennsylvania. Anyone who types the obvious spelling of your name lands on their case, not yours. A rebuild cannot fix that by itself, but proper local search work narrows how often it happens, and it is worth knowing.

SEE IT LIVE ↗

The bakery is world class. The website is the only part of it that isn't.

Everything above is a symptom, and none of it is the real finding. The real finding is the gap. Walk into 144 W. Michigan at 5:30 in the morning and you get the best bakery anywhere. We will say that plainly, because seventy-four years of Marshall lining up at one counter says it with us, and because people who moved away still pay to have a box of it sent across the country. Type your name into a browser and you get a site that says closed, staffed by people who do not exist. The quality on the screen has never once matched the quality in the case. A bakery this good deserves a website built to its own standard, and closing that gap is the entire reason this letter exists.

Why did the gap happen? Not neglect of the craft, plainly. A rented website that is awkward to change, so for six years nobody changed it.

SECTION TWO

The part that matters most.

What you have now

Your site runs on a Mopro subscription. Their link sits in your footer. You pay monthly for a website that froze in 2019, and if you ever stop paying, there is nothing to keep: the platform, the templates and the hosting are theirs.

WHAT WE WOULD DO INSTEAD

You own it. All of it.

When the build fee is paid, the site is yours in writing: design, source code, content, accounts. The domain is registered in your name. Month to month after launch, thirty days' notice, no penalty. If you ever leave, you take everything with you, working.

And the site knows what day it is

The stale vacation banner is not a typo somebody forgot. It is what happens when opening hours are a sentence a person has to remember to edit. On the site we built, open and closed are computed from the clock in Marshall. A vacation is one dated line; when the date passes, the site moves on by itself. The bug on your homepage today is not fixed on the new site. It is impossible.

Three questions worth asking any web vendor

1. If we stop paying you, what do we keep? 2. Can we see the price of every added service before it is added? 3. Whose name is the domain registered in? Our answers are: everything, yes, and yours. Ask Mopro the same three.

SECTION THREE

What we built.

Not what we would build. What we built, on our own time, before asking you for anything, because showing beats describing.

THE DEMO IS LIVE RIGHT NOW

LOUIES.GLAZEDWEB.COM/DEMO

Open it on your phone. That is where your customers are.

What is in it

A board that answers "what's in the case today." Your rotation already has rules: chocolate drops on Wednesdays, lemon jelly on Saturdays, eclairs in the cold months, photo cookies on two days' notice. The site knows them all, so the homepage says what is in the case this morning without anyone updating anything, ever.

A menu people can use. All sixty-one things you make, searchable, with a one-tap "in the case today" filter, and it prints onto four clean pages for the church-hall and office orders. One price per line, matching what Square charges at the counter, and changing a price is a text message to us, not a support ticket.

Your story, told with real people. Louie, 1952, the carousel oven that never fully goes off, and Jason's own words. The invented staff are gone.

Your reviews, on your site. "Best Damn Doughnuts Ever" belongs on your homepage, not three clicks away on someone else's.

An order form that works at 9pm. Your counter closes at 3. The form takes the dozen, the pie order and the photo-cookie request while you sleep, and it reaches you by email.

And the hat. Open the demo and watch your logo for a second. We think Louie would have smiled.

Built to a standard, and here is how we know

None of this is a mockup. It is a working site, measured rather than described.

- About two seconds to first paint on a phone, measured on a deliberately bad connection with a slow processor, which is the profile Google grades a site on.
- Zero accessibility failures at four screen sizes, checked with the standard auditing tool rather than by eye. Plenty of your customers are reading a phone at arm's length.
- It still works with JavaScript switched off, on an old phone, on the bakery's own wifi. All sixty-one items, still there.
- Nothing rented on top. No plugin subscriptions, no per-feature upsell, no page-builder licence.

The part where the shipping money is

You already ship two ways: the boxes you pack yourself, and your Goldbelly listing. Keep Goldbelly. Introducing you to somebody in Arizona who has never heard of Marshall is the one thing a marketplace does that a website cannot.

But a marketplace charges for that introduction on every order, forever, including the tenth order from the customer who now knows your name and would have typed your address in. Goldbelly does not publish that number; you know yours. Put it next to this one: on your own site a card payment costs about 2.9% plus 30 cents, the same order of money you already hand Square at the counter, and nothing else. No commission on the repeat order. And the buyer's email address is yours, which is the whole difference between a customer and a stranger who bought something once.

Here is the size of it, in your own numbers. Your Goldbelly listing sells five things, and a dozen Classic Nut Rolls is $75.95 delivered. That same dozen is roughly $23 at the prices on your menu. The difference is the tin, the freight and the marketplace's share, and today not one dollar of it is yours to set. Sell that dozen from your own page and whatever is left after the box and the truck is a decision you get to make: keep it, or hand some back and win the second order.

The demand is not theoretical either. The two reviews on that listing are the same customer in Tucson, Arizona, buying twice, and what she wrote about is the packing: "Not one cookie broke!" Somebody 1,700 miles away is a repeat customer of a bakery whose own website does not mention that it ships.

You already have a cart on your own site. It is the page quoting April. That is phase two, and it is a real phase, not a bolt-on: pick the box, pay, and the label prints in the back. The box page in the demo already lists all five, tins and fritters and the pumpkin cookies that come back in the fall. Quoted separately, when you want it, and never added to your bill before you say so.

SECTION FOUR

What it costs.

$1,900

$99/mo

One-time build. Everything described above, finished and launched on louies-bakery.com. Half to start, half on launch.

Hosting, SSL, security, backups, domain renewal, and ongoing content edits. Price changes? Closures? Send a text.

glazedweb

FINDINGS

OWNERSHIP

THE SITE

COST

NEXT

prints in back, and it costs the bakery zero dollars a month because a small guest-paid order fee funds it. Everything on the site that says "give us a call, N days ahead" becomes a paid preorder instead of a phone note, and the same checkout handles the shipping boxes described in section three. Quoted separately when you want it; nothing is ever added to your bill before you approve it.

How that compares to staying put

We are not going to guess at your Mopro bill. Put your own number in and the math does itself. It runs entirely on this page; nothing is sent anywhere. For scale: Mopro's own pricing page says plans start at $199 a month.

MOPRO'S PRICING PAGE ↗

YOUR CURRENT MONTHLY, IN DOLLARS

$99

$149

$199

$299

Five more years of what you have

$8,940

Rebuild + five years with Glazed

$7,840

Rebuilding saves you $1,100 over five years, and you own the site at the end of it, instead of renting one.

That is $50 less every month, so the build pays for itself in month 38.

SECTION FIVE

What happens next.

1 Look at the demo

Ten minutes at louies.glazedweb.com/demo, on your phone, over coffee. It cost you nothing and it obligates you to nothing. If it is not right, that is useful to hear too.

2 Text or call Kevin

One conversation. Bring the questions, especially the skeptical ones. glazedweb.com · kevin@glazedweb.com

What we'd need from you

Your real logo file, from whoever printed your shirts or made your sign. Half a morning with a camera in the bakery: the case at opening, the oven turning, nut rolls up close. Your actual closure dates for the year. And four small menu facts to confirm, starting with whether that pastry price is really sixty cents.

The demo was built from public information and your own published menu. Anything we got wrong, we fix before launch, which is rather the point of owning a site somebody can actually edit.

glazedweb

Kevin Hershock · Marshall, Michigan
glazedweb.com · kevin@glazedweb.com

Prepared for Louie's Bakery · August 2026 · Valid 60 days